Switching Gears Worked for Frank Roth

A few months into retirement, Frank Roth II decided he needed to “find something to do.”

He worked a variety of different jobs then set his sights on becoming an ordained pastor. Within 3½ years, he went from “Forester Frank” to “Father Frank.” He’s the rector at Saint Matthias Episcopal Church in Tuscaloosa.

That’s quite a switch, right?

“Well,” Roth said, “the subject matter is a little different, but we talked a lot about stewardship in forestry.”

Frank Roth II started his Extension career in Alabama, but took a job in Arkansas as an Extension forester in 1988. He worked out of the Southwest Research and Extension Center in Hope.

As Extension forester, Roth traveled often and worked with county agents and Arkansans who were managing forestland. He also worked on various Extension forestry programs, including 4-H. He was involved in summer camps and 4-H forestry contests.

Roth had an interest in forestry from a young age.

Roth, a Louisiana native, continues to counsel and work with people, though the questions he gets as a pastor are different. Roth said for many years he read about people who switched career gears but never thought he would become one of them.

He wouldn’t change his trajectory, though. He considers his years at Extension some of the best and feels the real world experience helped prepare him for his current role in the church.

Roth and his wife of 43 years moved to Tuscaloosa in 2008. The Roths are busy with church activities, but they regularly take time to drive over to a cabin they own “way out in the boondocks” for some fishing and downtime.

The Roths have three daughters and six grandchildren.

Vetress Strong, Retired EFNEP Assistant, Still Works to Benefit Community

In 1969, Vetress Strong was a homemaker, a mother of three children and a farmer’s wife. That was also the year she added a new title to her name: EFNEP program assistant. “EFNEP was a pilot program that came to Jefferson County, and I decided to apply for a job,” she said.

Strong worked with families with limited income to increase their knowledge about nutrition, budgeting and gardening. She even helped many families plant their own backyard gardens then store the plentiful crops in jars. The homemakers also worked together in large “canning kitchens.”

She encouraged the women to save their canned foods and enter them in the county fair in the fall. “Then, after they won their blue ribbons and their prize money, they could take the food home and eat it,” she said.

Strong was promoted to senior program assistant in 1979 and remained in that post until she retired in 2002.

Several years later Strong decided to become certified as a nurse’s assistant. While working for Extension, she took various college classes with an eye toward a gerontology degree. She now works in assisted living facilities.

She’s also a volunteer Jefferson County ombudsman, advocating for older folks who are in area nursing homes.

“It’s so rewarding,” she said. Strong crochets, knits and enjoys time with her 24 grandchildren. She has five children. “My husband and five children were my right hand on the Extension journey. I could not have made it without them,” she said.

Strong is an active member of the White Hall United Pentecostal Church. She still finds ways to connect with Extension friends. Strong is a certified Master Gardener and takes part in the Strong Women and Men exercise program several times a week.

Strong, who has been married to her husband, Conray, for 54 years, is a member at large of the homemaker’s club.

From the Editorial Board

In addition to voting for President this November, you will also have the opportunity to vote on proposed constitutional amendments and laws. The information comes from the Public Policy Center in the Division of Agriculture and was vetted through a legal review and revisions by organizations or individuals who are opponents and proponents.

Arkansas Sales Tax Increase — The legislature has placed on November’s ballot the question of whether or not the state will increase its sales tax from 6 percent to 6.5 percent over the next 10 years to pay off bonds for four-lane highway construction projects. The increase would not apply to groceries and would expire once the bonds are paid off. The constitutional amendment would also dedicate one cent per gallon of the state’s fuel tax to the State Aid Street Fund.

Financial Reform for Counties and Municipalities — This constitutional amendment would allow counties and municipalities to create districts where sales tax receipts would be used to pay off bonds issued for infrastructure improvements; to issue bonds to retire unfunded liabilities for closed police and fire pension plans; and to use money from sources other than the general fund to pay off short-term loan debt.

There are two possible issues that might be on the ballot. One legalizes medical marijuana and the other is an Arkansas Casino Amendment. If either or both make their way onto the ballot on or before early October, we’ll provide you with more information.
